eyes closed for an instant, and the hard lines relaxing showed a gentle, tender face.

Then she sat suddenly erect and the deflance and bitterness all came back.

Sleep she kept saying, 'Bread, mother; give me bread.' And I took her up once, meaning to kill her, that she might not suffer any more, but the touch of her soft hands drove that madness from my brain. But come, I can hear her sobbing as she sits there, waiting for me to bring her bread." Then sud-whether we starve?"

"Want! Distress! All I 'want' is work and all my 'distress' is a starving child sitting homeless on a stranger's doorstep!" Oh! the despair and desperation in her voice! Was it possible such things could be? Ringing for my office boy I told him to order a carriage instantly. Not a word was spoken between us during the few moments which clapsed, At length the boy returned, saying a carriage was waiting.

"I am going for your child, You must whether we starve?"

"A friend," was all the reply my choking came like. "We drove in silence to the street she disection this was the woman I would have sent away with an indifferent "No," sent away to starvation or suscide. "You need not refuse," I replied; "they are worth that to me and more, too. I know a quiet boarding-house, where you can engage a room for a few days, just long enough to provide yourself and daughter with a few necessary things; by that time I shall have found a place for you by the seashore, where you must go and stay until you are well and strong again, for when you come back to town again I shall have work for you. No thanks, please," I added as she lifted her sad brown eyes to mine and tried to speak.

In truth, now that the strain was relaxed, she was too ill to think, too speak. Making sufficient explanations I left her in the care of the kindly woman who kept the boarding-house. Handing her my eard, I said:

who had agreed to give her a lesson each day, if I would send down a machine.

And so it was that on her return to town And so it was that on her return to town she was established in the office of a frient of mine. His office was on the same floor of the building as my own, and I found my intimacy with him rapidly increasing. Two or three errands a day would call me into his office, and if the sad-faced typewriter was not there to great me with her gentle smile, my seemed singularly mentisfactory. My fri did not seem to talk with the discretion young lawyer, and I would leave with a sense of irritation I could ill suppress.

ask?"
"Mrs. Stephen Baylor," and timidly extending her hand she looked the thanks she could not speak.

After they had been some two weeks at the seashore I went to see them. The child had already regained its perfect health, and the mother was wonderfully improved. During this visit I suggested her becoming a type-which had so long been lacking had at last this will she had married a gay and writer, knowing a young woman who was coming to this place for her vacation, and the control of the contr
